

Consumers have a right to control how internet service providers use their sensitive data. Keep Federal Communications Commission rules in place to require companies like Comcast, AT&T, and Verizon to get customers' permission before they sell consumer data. Without Net Neutrality, ISP providers, such as Comcast, could threaten content providers, such as Netflix, to pay extra to deliver content. The ability for companies to control the flow information and content over the internet is a horrifying prospect that rings of totalitarianism. Internet should be a public utility that all Americans have access too.
